Youngsters have a block party with Japanese toy

These impressive towers have been put together by children from Swaffield School, who were taking part in a tsumiki workshop.

Masayuki Ogino, a craftsman carpenter from Yamanashi Prefecture in Japan, started making the wooden building blocks eight years ago for his son.

Using cut-offs and wood from managed forests, he made thousands of blocks with just three designs.

Mr Ogino said he started attending craft fairs with the blocks and was amazed by the children's response to a pile of tsumiki left on the table and began to develop a series of workshops for schools.

"The workshops are about more than just playing with bricks - the children learn a lot about themselves and their friends," he added. "Even the most distracted children are totally absorbed in their task."

His voluntary workshops have been enjoyed at schools throughout Japan and he is now giving free workshops to primary schools in London.
